Being a psychotherapist is an emotionally demanding profession. Making time to attend to our own life issues, unexpressed feelings and thoughts and relational issues, creates more 'space' for ourselves and our clients.

Participating in a safe confidential therapy group environment offers therapists a unique process that 'holds' each member. It provides support, connection, a sense of belonging along with acceptance and understanding. Early wounds are addressed and personal growth is fostered; thereby reducing aloneness and stress many therapists carry. The experience in group can be transformative!

The Modern Analytic Group Process Model as developed by Louis Ormont harnesses the power of the group itself as a therapeutic agent; focuses on emotional connection and interaction, rather than intellectual understanding to resolve obstacles to intimacy; promotes individuation and explores one's ability to make and maintain contact. Over time, members become more emotionally aware and expressive which helps to cultivate more rewarding relationships and a fuller life!

Attending to one's internal process for self-care and healing nourishes and expands our capacity as therapists.
